

"Allan Kahane, a first-time novelist whose background in international business, including newspaper publishing in the Middle East, has led him to write a thriller in which a New York financier, Jack Burke, loses his family in a terrorist bombing of FAO Schwartz and sets out to find one of the conspirators in the attack to wreak personal revenge.

"Along the way he encounters a shadowy group of rogue former intelligence agents, frustrated with the West's failure to find the terrorists. Their goal is a campaign of blackmail and warfare against the sheikdoms, kingdoms, and dictatorships funding the global jihad.

"It's a lively, if improbable, story that will entertain while imparting some interesting facts along the way."

Alan Caruba, Bookviews.com